DADDY'S EVENING FAIRY TALE OF MARY GRAHAM BOWNER
"The Little Prince and the Princess"

MISS PENGUIN REFUSES.

Mr. Johnny Penguin smooched down his feathers with great care, for he was going a-calling. He looked around the beach and then gazed keenly far out upon the ocean. He strutted around a moment or two and then looked about him again.

"What shall I take her?" he asked himself. There were plenty of other penguins around whom he could have asked for advice but he didn't want anyone's advice. He wanted to decide the question himself. The only thing was that he didn't quite know how to answer his own question. That was difficult, yes, it most certainly was difficult.

"I might," he said to himself, "take her an ocean wave. That would be a present such as no penguin has ever had before and it would be sure to please her. But I do not know how to get the wave for her. As soon as I got it another might come along and take it away from me. That is a trick waves have of doing."

"I know," he continued to himself, "I will ask her if she would like a wave for a present. I will leave it to her to decide. That is what I shall do, yes sir, that is what I shall do."

So he picked up a stick he found upon the beach and strutted along in a very proud and haughty fashion.

"With my fine walking cane no one can resist me," he said.

As he walked along with his head high in the air he thought of what a lovely home he would have with Miss Penguin, for he was going a-calling on the loveliest Miss Penguin on the whole island.

At one time he looked down and saw a fine stone, smooth and quite perfect.

"This will just do for her," he said, "for Miss Penguin must be given an engagement ring if I am to ask her to marry me. She will expect it and she will accept it, ha, ha, ha," and he gave a laugh of joy.

At last he reached the spot where Miss Penguin was standing.

"How fine and straight she stands," he said to himself, and then he stopped right in front of Miss Penguin.

"I've come to see you, Miss Penguin," he said, "and I want you to be my mate. Here is the engagement ring."

He dropped the stone in front of her. She certainly could not refuse it. But Miss Penguin looked in another direction and did not pay any attention to the stone.

"Miss Penguin," he said, "will you not accept me as a mate? I will give you a wave as a wedding gift. I will get you the finest wave in the whole ocean and you can have it to use as you like."

Miss Penguin turned her head toward Mr. Johnny Penguin. All the other penguins were watching. Mr. Johnny wished he could talk to her alone. He wished he could tell her what a fine mate he would be without all these creatures looking on. He found himself quite shy with so many around.

"What in the world, or on the island, or in the ocean, or under the stars or the moon or the sun will I do with a wave, Mr. Penguin?" she asked. All the other penguins had begun to titter. Mr. Johnny Penguin didn't know what to say.

He thought for a moment and then raising his head he said in a loud voice, "It is a gift such as no other penguin has ever had. I am doing you a great honor when I offer it to you."

Miss Penguin burst out laughing. "I couldn't have it," she said, "because I couldn't have it. You couldn't get a wave if you wanted to. They belong to the ocean—all waves do. You could no more get it for me than you could get the moon or the sun or the stars or the trees. What nonsense you do talk, Mr. Penguin."
